

The Importance of Family and the Deficiency of Residential Institutions

By: Katherine Taylor

Abstract

This paper compares the ways in which institutional residential care, foster care, and adoption affect children. It uses scientific research studies to show the effects each method of caregiving has on a child's growth, development, and life-long success. It argues that either domestic or international adoption are the best approaches to serving orphans and other children in need.